versions, suggesting that Girtin had tapped into a lucrative market, and there is a sense that his Welsh scenes do not noticeably extend either the subject's iconography or his imagination. More significant in terms of the development of Girtin's career is a watercolour now titled Pont Seiont, Looking Towards Mynydd Mawr, which is one of only two Welsh scenes dated 1799. This is noteworthy because it means that the on-the-spot sketch it is based must date from 1798, TG1327, and that it and a number of other colour studies cannot have been produced on a later, conjectural trip that earlier Girtin scholars ^{argued} ~~thought~~ took place in 1800 (Girtin and Loshak, 1954, p.40, p.183). The date is also significant because the work was first recorded in the possession of Samuel William Reynolds (1773-1835) who, as Girtin's agent/dealer, sold it to Elizabeth Weddell (1749-1831) at the end of 1801, along with four other watercolours (Archive: Reynolds 2). Girtin produced a couple of other Welsh views in 1800 of Caernarfon and Conwy for Reynolds to sell on, TG1738 and TG1739, but this view appears to have been the first he painted for the dealer, all of which suggests that at the same time as he was producing large works on commission for patrons from the landed classes, the artist was also looking to address other sectors of the market, using a third party to reduce his dependence on traditional forms of patronage.
